In addition, the infarction was limited to the basal ganglia, which is less likely to affect consciousness, than the infarction in the periventricular area of the brain. In our case, the patient presented with right hemiparesis and aphasia, without any disturbance of consciousness. If it were a stress-induced vasospasm, the patient might have presented with disturbance of consciousness, as in our case. A characteristic feature of the amyloid angiopathy is that the capillary walls are thickened, and the lumen is narrowed. Although thickening of the capillary wall is commonly observed in pheochromocytoma-associated VH, this phenomenon is not a pathological sign, and is often observed in the blood vessels of patients with hypertension or diabetes \[[@CR7]\]. However, the walls of the blood vessels in our case were not thickened, and the lumen was relatively large. In our patient, the capillary wall was not thickened and the lumen was narrow, with only one or two erythrocytes passing through in the center of the lumen, and the intercapillary space remained open (Fig. 3{ref-type="fig"}). This suggests that the thickening of the capillary wall is not the pathological feature of the amyloid angiopathy in pheochromocytoma-associated VH. In the case of pheochromocytoma-associated VH, we speculated that the patient's dysaut
